The Age of Great-Power Competition | Foreign Affairs

The Asia-Pacific is one of the world's major strategic theaters. As China's economy and military grow, it is likely to become a regional superpower. The United States will remain the leading power, but China will become its major rival.

The two countries have diverging strategic and economic interests, and their competition is unlikely to resolve peacefully. The stakes are high, and U.S.-China relations will likely be characterized by a growing level of competition. This will present new challenges for U.S. policymakers, who must develop a strategy to manage this competition.

The United States and China are both important players in the Asia-Pacific region, and their relationship has a significant impact on global politics and economics. The competition between these two countries is likely to continue for some time, and it is crucial for policymakers to understand the underlying dynamics and navigate this complex landscape.
